HIV testing: the key to early diagnosis, treatment and prevention

On 1 December, the commemoration of World AIDS Day focuses on the ongoing AIDS pandemic caused by HIV – which remains of major public health importance in the EU/EEA as well. Despite the development of effective therapies which improve life expectancy for people diagnosed with HIV, a significant proportion of HIV-infected Europeans remain undiagnosed and are diagnosed at a late stage of infection.

As late diagnosis leads to a significantly higher risk of unwittingly spreading the virus, this is one of the key problems leading to a continuing rise of HIV infections across Europe.

On World AIDS Day 2010, Europe's leading HIV experts and EU policy makers meet in the European Parliament to discuss the importance and benefits of the increased uptake of HIV testing. The European Centre for Disease prevention and Control (ECDC) will launch its evidence-based HIV testing guidance to support countries to improve their national HIV testing strategies. It outlines a strategic approach to develop effective national HIV testing interventions and to ensure access for all Europeans to HIV testing and counselling services.
